

Gene Autry

September 29, 1907 - October 2, 1998

Studio City, California

Orvon Grover "Gene" Autry - American singing cowboy who turned radio, B-westerns, and Christmas carols into a civic brand of honesty - died at his home in Studio City, California, on October 2, 1998. He was ninety-one. Born September 29, 1907, in Tioga, Texas, he rode from telegraph offices and Oklahoma radio into films that defined the straight-shooting hero for a generation of kids who still believed a white hat meant something.

Back in the Saddle Again, Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer, and Here Comes Santa Claus made him a holiday fixture. He flew with the Army Air Forces in World War II, later owned the California Angels, and built a Western museum in Los Angeles so the gear would not vanish into attic boxes. He died of lymphoma complications at home in Studio City.

Texas gave him the drawl; Hollywood gave him the range. He worked as if patriotism could also hum a tune.

He died in Studio City on October 2, 1998. Somewhere a Saturday matinee is still starting with a song before the chase.

Autry's gift was usable myth - making Western manners sound neighborly. Notice Nearby keeps the death date so October 2 remembers the singing cowboy who sold America a cleaner trail.
